Samples of lunar material from Apollo 12 was subjected to preliminary analysis by several techniques which included mass spectrometry, gas chromatography, liquid chromatography and nuclear magnetic resonance and their variations in an effort to detect the presence of organic compounds. None were found. On the basis of the levels of detection ascribed to certain of the methods employed, it is assumed that if organic matter were present it would exist in concentrations less than one part per million.